Background

Character History

Kandrak is a young minotaur barbarian. He is very skeptical of magic, but doesn't outright reject it.

Kandrak grew up <HERE> and spent some time in his youth to learn the martial side of his society. He was good at that. His father Ranruk was a good teacher. Strict, but always within reason. Additionally, he taught Kandrak how to navigate and not lose his way. As a retired sailor Ranruk had seen his share of the world. Now as a family man, he gave up sailing and found new purpose as a carpenter.

Kandrak's mother Berakena is a baker. Her bread and pastries are well-received in the community. As a mother of four, she certainly knows how to run a tight ship.

Kandrak has three siblings. He is the third-born. (Girl, boy, boy, girl.)

The eldest sister is the ever dutiful daughter taking after their mother. She started her training as a baker early and poured in all her effort. She will take over the business. No question about it.

His 2nd brother took after their father and joined a sailing crew as soon as he was of able age. He is currently out at sea and visits his village, when his duties allow it.

The youngest sister showed a talent for magic at a young age and was recruited by <MAGIC SOCIETY HERE> two years ago. It was a momentous occasion for the village. Such things did not often happen.

Kandrak learned to trust the dice from an old orc. Although he could never quite beat the man in the game, he at least managed to learn the language of the orcs and some of their customs.

The endurance of the dwarves fascinates Kandrak. How can such small bodies swing hammers with such power. How can they persevere in the heat of the forge? Had adventure not called, it might as well have been that Kandrak became a smith. Although he never got the chance to learn the craft properly, he earned some of the basics while helping out in the local smithy. His respect for the dwarves further rose, when he was unceremoniously dumpstered in a drinking contest.
